

Greetings from Tyler,

It seems the global warming hysteria has calmed somewhat in the wake of numerous revelations of fraudulent “science.” For a while there, you couldn't turn on the TV without being treated to a forest of iconic windmills. Lately, we haven't heard much about emergency efforts needed to “save the planet” from c02. But now we know that a bi-partisan effort is under way to boost the cost and availability of energy and due to be unveiled as a proposed “law” in the U.S. Senate in the weeks ahead.

This quote appeared in a Reuters release today. “The White House is...eager to show the rest of the world the United States is ready to take a leadership role on global warming...” The global warming fraternity has been so embarrassed of late, by revelations of fraudulent data produced to back its preposterous theory, no one has even come forward to defend the notion.

“Energy prices will necessarily skyrocket” is the quote that comes to mind. And the notion that no one wants to defend at this point is that man can somehow pass laws, levy taxes and regulate behavior in ways that will change the weather! It's a classic case of man vs. nature, and it's based on a theory that has suffered near fatal blows on numerous fronts. But it will apparently be visited upon us anyway if the politicians get their way, and nothing has stopped them yet.

If they actually think they have the power to alter weather patterns, why don't they do something about the drift of volcanic ash from Iceland over Europe? Similar to other events of nature, this is known as “an act of God.” It's something man simply is not equipped to alter.

The volcanic ash situation is having a massive economic impact on Europe, as tens of thousands of airline flights are grounded, people are stranded away from home and there's not much anybody can do about it but change their plans. The domino effect on the world economy will undoubtedly be substantial, but Europe, already in dire economic straits, will suffer the brunt of it.

With the pope in serious trouble, an uncertain future for the Catholic church particularly in Germany, a precarious situation for the euro and all the nations that have adopted it, we may well be looking toward major upheaval across the European continent as these things play out.

The groundwork for major upheaval here at home, or better put, fundamental transformation, is being laid at a blinding pace. Our leaders across the spectrum are lately more anxious to clamp down on our God given rights and freedoms than tackling the menace of terrorism or the prospect of a nuclear Iran. Israel has become a whipping boy in the Middle East, rather than enjoying the friendship and unwavering support that characterized our unique relationship until now.

Very little substantive insight is available in the mainstream media. But deception is everywhere you look. There is little doubt now, the world is in for a time of trouble of Biblical proportions in the foreseeable future.

Even some lesser known politicians and commentators have begun to call for repentance and turning to God to save America from the ruin at the end of the road we're on. But it doesn't seem to be catching on...yet.

The GTA telecast brought 396 requests for material on the Sabbath this week, with 207 first time contacts. Have a good one. We still have much to enjoy and more than the rest of the world has ever known for which to give thanks.

Mark Armstrong

Additional News Story:

Volcanic ash is costing airlines more than \$200 million a day.