

27 November 2009

Greetings from Tyler,

We've had gorgeous weather and a wonderful Thanksgiving and hope it's worked out that way for all of you. Most of you probably know of the close call Stan Roberts' brother had over the past few days. Last word is that things are looking better for Stan's brother Johnny, and we have high hopes for his recovery.

Depending on how it all plays out, we may have something unexpected to give thanks for. You may know by now about the publication of communications between some of the foremost scientists at the climatic research unit of East Anglia University in England, colluding to bamboozle the public by destroying research that disputes their climate-change agenda. It's been called the biggest scandal in scientific history. Actually, the theory of evolution may be the biggest, but why quibble at this stage?

Wouldn't it be great if the grand scheme of the United Nations and many Western governments to redistribute the world's wealth, tax energy green and virtually enslave the industrial first world on the basis of this flimsy theory of global warming fell completely apart? It turns out that these "scientists" have been in the forefront of trying to characterize anybody not in agreement with their bogus conclusions and (even worse) solutions, as lunatic. Too bad all the news and talk shows over the holiday weekend are repeats. We'll probably have to wait till next week for this explosive story to get serious attention. But one can't help feeling encouraged about the possibility that some light might be shone on the actual truth of the global warming myth.

After all, Europe and its new central EU government were already salivating over the prospect of using the ruse of "climate crisis" to implement global management (taxation and regulation of everything to do with the production and use of energy) just last week! What a fly in their ointment! We'll have to wait and see whether the mainstream media, so committed to green everything and the religion of climate crisis, will be able to circle the wagons and somehow prevent this devastating news from being exposed to the general population.

Maybe the UN, the EU and the Church at Rome will just have to come up with a new excuse to govern the planet!

Why can't governments and UN institutions focus a little more urgency on the real threats to world security? I'll answer that. It wouldn't be "politically correct" or financially expedient! It is impossible to estimate the vast sums intended to be levied, taxed and redistributed on the basis of climate crisis. Let's just say it's incalculable! They just can't rightly enslave us over Iran's nuclear program, or the threat that exists in Pakistan.

With all that we've written in recent weeks, you are all aware of the many actual crises that exist around the world, that actually have the potential to upend life as we know it, besides global solutions to the climate crisis. Rather than ruin what's left of a great weekend right here and now with further discussion of the world's intractable problems, I think I'd rather wish you all a wonderful Sabbath!

Until next time,

Mark Armstrong

P.S. Due to the short business week, program results will be in the next Update.
